

How to Market Your Course to Your Audience

A PRACTICAL GUIDE FOR LEVORO INSTRUCTORS

This guide will help you create content that attracts the right people, builds trust, and turns interests into course enrollments.

1 Start with a clear positioning

Before you write a single post, answer 3 questions:

1. Who is this course for?
2. What problem does it solve?
3. What changes for them after completing it?

Your positioning is not a course description, it is the reason someone stops scrolling on social media.

Bad example: "I created a course about communication."

Good example: "I help professionals speak up in meetings without sounding aggressive or unsure."

2 Define your ideal student

Write for one person, not everyone. When you try to reach everyone, you reach no one.

Picture the person who needs your course most right now - what is their job title, their daily frustration, the thing they Googled last week. Get curious about the "ideal students" mind and problems.

Example: "My course is for mid-level managers who know their subject but struggle to get buy-in from their team."

3 Teach before you sell

Your audience follows you to learn, not to see promotions. Share one useful idea per post, a shift in thinking, a reframe, a practical tip.

When people learn from you for free, buying from you feels natural.

Example: Instead of writing "Enroll in my leadership course," write "Here is the one question I ask before every difficult conversation with my team, and why it changes the outcome."

4

Use your own story

Be honest with your audience and share your own story.

Share the moment you struggled with exactly. That story is what makes people feel understood and relate to you.

Example: "Three years ago I was the person who over-explained everything in meetings. I thought more details made me understandable, but it didn't. Here is what I learned instead..."

5

Make the transformation visible

People do not pay for information, they pay for a result they can picture.

Show the before and after clearly in your content, demonstrate what is possible.

Example: Before: "I dreaded performance reviews because I never knew what to say."
After: "I now run reviews in 30 minutes with clear outcomes both sides agree on."

6

Create a free sample of your course

Give your followers a reason to trust your teaching before they commit.
A short free lesson, a practical checklist, or a single framework from your course works well.

When someone gets value from your free content, the paid course becomes the obvious next step.

Example: "I put together a free 10-minute lesson from my course on customer service. This covers the one phrase that de-escalates almost any difficult conversation. Link in bio."

7

Know your platform - Social Media platforms

Different platforms reward different content. Post where your audience already spends time, and match the format to the platform.

Consistency matters more than being everywhere. Choose 1-2 platforms where your audience is and show up there regularly - a few times a week is enough.

Instagram:

- Carousels - one idea across 5-8 slides
- First slide = hook, if it doesn't stop the scroll, people will not read it
- Short videos (reels) - one insight per video, max 60 seconds
- Always reply to comments - it signals activity to the algorithm
- Stories - give everyday tips and show your life (also adding links is helpful)

LinkedIn:

- Short insight posts - one sharp observation from your field
- Long personal posts - a story, event reflection, or lesson learned from real experience
- Story + lesson format - what happened, what it taught you
- Write like you talk - no corporate language

Facebook:

- Short value posts - one insight and one takeaway
- Text + image posts perform best - visuals stop the scroll and boost engagement
- Active participation in relevant Facebook groups: share your knowledge, answer questions, mention your course naturally when it fits
- Links work here unlike Instagram - add them directly in the post

TikTok:

- Short videos 15-60 seconds - one idea, one insight per video
- Hook in the first 2-3 seconds - if you don't stop the scroll immediately, the video won't be watched
- Subtitles are essential, most people watch without sound
- Teach something small and useful - quick tips, surprising facts
- Always reply to comments - it signals activity to the algorithm

8 Use strong hooks on posts

The first line of your post decides whether anyone reads the post. A strong hook is specific, creates a gap in understanding, or challenges something the reader thinks they already know.

Write your hook last, after you know what the post is actually about.

Weak example: "AI is changing the future of work."

Strong example: "AI won't take your job, someone who knows how to use it might."

9 End with one clear next step (CTA)

CTA = Call To Action

Every piece of content should guide your audience somewhere.

A clear CTA removes the need for your reader to make a decision, you make it for them.

Simple posting formula for social media:

Every post you write should follow this structure:

1 Hook

One line that earns the attention.

2 Problem

Name what your reader already feels.

3 Insight

Your perspective or what you have learned.

4 Example

Make it concrete and real.

5 Soft Mention

"This course gives you..."

6 CTA

To take the course, save this post, share with friends.
